Executive Summary

- The Fund outperformed the Russell 2000 Index over the past year and the last quarter, driven by both security selection and sector allocation. The largest detractors to the past quarter and year were within the health care sector.
- New positions were initiated in multiple sectors, taking advantage of the volatility in stock prices.
- The focus remains on finding solid companies that are attractively priced with long runways for growth in sales, income, and free cash flow.

Performance factors

During the past quarter, Thrivent Small Cap Stock Fund outperformed the Russell 2000 Index due to both security selection and sector allocation. Positive security selection was led by the information technology sector, while health care was the largest negative contributor. The largest detractor owned within the health care sector was Enovis, a joint oriented medical technology company, as growth slowed below expectations. Contract electronics manufacturer TTM Technologies was the largest contributor to the positive stock selection within information technology. We remain positive on both Enovis and TTM.

The Fund's sector weightings result from our security selection based on bottom-up industry and company research. Sector allocation impact for the quarter was small in most sectors; the overweighting of the consumer staples sector was the largest contributor to positive allocation performance, slightly offset by the underweighting in the industrials sector, contributing to negative allocation performance.

During the quarter we initiated a position in Haemonetics, a manufacturer of blood processing and related healthcare equipment. The opportunity to own this well-positioned company presented itself after it showed up on our screens and one of our portfolio managers met with the company. Our research discovered that the investments made in the business over the last couple of years have put them in a competitively advantaged position to accelerate growth and improve margins over the next few years. Our expectation of improved operating outcomes coupled with a long runway for continued growth in cash flows allowed us to add a quality company to the portfolio at an attractive price.

Over the past 12 months, the Fund outperformed due to both security selection and sector allocation. Positive security selection was led by the financials and materials sectors. Negative security selection was led by the health care sector. Like the quarter, Enovis was the largest detractor. The position was reviewed, and we remain positive Enovis.

Sector allocation for the past year was positive in most sectors, with the largest negative contributor being the underweighting in the energy sector.

Portfolio outlook

With the current level of business uncertainty and the Federal Funds rate remaining unchanged during the quarter, it is unclear by how much and how long the economy will be impacted. However, investor sentiment about the economy fluctuates much more rapidly and with greater amplitude than actual changes in activity. These swings in economic sentiment often result in sharp movements in stock prices, which can present opportunities. As a result, positions were added to or initiated in multiple sectors, while other positions were reduced or sold as investment theses played out or proved no longer valid. Our focus remains on finding solid companies that are attractively priced with long runways ahead of them for growth in sales, income, and free cash flow.
